Commercial Washrooms Innovations in Design and Efficiency

By Richard Bolton, Brand & Product Manager at washroom management specialists Cistermiser

Today's office buildings are seen as very much a visual reflection of the brands housed within them and significant investment is often made, into facilities and public areas, to help reflect this.

Well-designed, clean and attractive washrooms, for example, can have a significant impact for both visitors and employees. A smart washroom sets the standard of cleanliness for the whole building, helping to reflect a company's determination to deliver a great customer experience, just as clearly as an impressive reception area. Conversely, low quality or poorly maintained facilities can be an embarrassment, reflecting badly on the organisation and its attitude to both customers and staff.

Modern washrooms can also be part of a drive to support an active, healthy workforce through the addition of showers, hairdryers etc. Unfortunately, as attractive as these additions are, they use considerable amounts of energy and water which, of course, in turn increases companies' overheads.

But that isn't the only issue facing companies and landlords. Many businesses now are looking for flexible office space to lease on short or extended terms leases, to meet the needs of a more mobile, often "remote", team members. Washrooms can therefore remain unused for months at a time - and leaving standing water in pipes for any length of time is never a good thing. The good news is that the technology that can help support both the aesthetics and functionality of washrooms is modern, discrete, and very user-friendly which means it is likely to enhance rather than detract from even the most high-end design specifications.

Infrared sensors, for example, can be positioned to detect visitors to the washroom and automatically switch on the lights and ventilation as well as the water supply. Other sensors can be deployed to deliver 'no-touch' taps and improve urinal and WC flush controls.

Such is the effectiveness of IR systems that they can play a major part in contributing to the building's BREEAM rating because the water and energy savings can be astonishing. This was recently demonstrated at Thames Water's Clearwater House head office. In a pilot project involving two washrooms, Thames Water replaced the existing urinal sensors with Cistermiser's Direct Flush and installed infrared taps. They collectively reduced the amount of water used during the trial period by an impressive 91 per cent.
