Our final Neville Lumb 'inspire' event for 2016 was held on 27th October in the basement of our office in Kirby Street, Clerkenwell.

The Neville Lumb event sponsored by RWC included free food and drinks along with an art demonstration and exhibition by Richard Scott. Local DJ Chris Geisler provided the music from his vinyl record collection setting the scene in our contemporary basement facility. The successful evening provided Architects and Designers a relaxed environment to network and learn more about Neville Lumb and its FREE bathroom specification service.

Inspire events will be running throughout 2017 and demand for tickets is high for these exclusive events. Keep an eye out for the announcement of each upcoming event and date via our social media pages and website.

Commercial Washrooms Innovations in Design and Efficiency

By Richard Bolton, Brand & Product Manager at washroom management specialists Cistermiser

Today's office buildings are seen as very much a visual reflection of the brands housed within them and significant investment is often made, into facilities and public areas, to help reflect this.

Well-designed, clean and attractive washrooms, for example, can have a significant impact for both visitors and employees. A smart washroom sets the standard of cleanliness for the whole building, helping to reflect a company's determination to deliver a great customer experience, just as clearly as an impressive reception area. Conversely, low quality or poorly maintained facilities can be an embarrassment, reflecting badly on the organisation and its attitude to both customers and staff.

Modern washrooms can also be part of a drive to support an active, healthy workforce through the addition of showers, hairdryers etc. Unfortunately, as attractive as these additions are, they use considerable amounts of energy and water which, of course, in turn increases companies' overheads.

But that isn't the only issue facing companies and landlords. Many businesses now are looking for flexible office space to lease on short or extended terms leases, to meet the needs of a more mobile, often "remote", team members. Washrooms can therefore remain unused for months at a time - and leaving standing water in pipes for any length of time is never a good thing. The good news is that the technology that can help support both the aesthetics and functionality of washrooms is modern, discrete, and very user-friendly which means it is likely to enhance rather than detract from even the most high-end design specifications.

Infrared sensors, for example, can be positioned to detect visitors to the washroom and automatically switch on the lights and ventilation as well as the water supply. Other sensors can be deployed to deliver 'no-touch' taps and improve urinal and WC flush controls.

Such is the effectiveness of IR systems that they can play a major part in contributing to the building's BREEAM rating because the water and energy savings can be astonishing. This was recently demonstrated at Thames Water's Clearwater House head office. In a pilot project involving two washrooms, Thames Water replaced the existing urinal sensors with Cistermiser's Direct Flush and installed infrared taps. They collectively reduced the amount of water used during the trial period by an impressive 91 per cent.

THE HYDRO GLASGOW
Architect
FOSTER & PARTNERS

A sensitive tap that can handle the big crowds

Saving water, saving money and making a positive contribution to BREEAM assessments.

The Hydro, Glasgow's newest entertainment venue, and a city landmark, with a seating capacity of 12,000, will play host to 140 events a year, attracting over one million spectators.

The London-based architects Foster & Partners chose to install Dolphin Infra-red Sensor taps. These WRAS-approved taps aren't just stylish, they go a long way to help conserve water, reduce a building's carbon footprint and have a low environmental impact that helps make a positive contribution to BREEAM assessments.
